There are hundreds of thousands and training in the office to fill the higher honor when Conrad Syme resigned to take up a private practice.

Daniel J. Donovan, long secretary of the Board of District Confmissioners, and signally prominent as adjutant general for the District during war times, was thoroughly equipped to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Alonzo Tweedale, and he got the place.

The new superintendent of police, Harry L. Gessford, had thirty-nine years of experience in the affairs of the department before he was promoted to head the department upon the death of Maj. Pullman.

Dr. Fowler has given the best years of his life to guarding the health of Washington, and was specially fitted for advancement when Dr. William C. Woodward heard the call from Boston.

Daniel Garges has grown up with the District government, and from the standpoint of knowing the city and municipal administration could not have been better equipped to fill the shoes which Auditor Donovan vacated.

Now, Ben L. Prince, tax collector, has resigned and Chatham M. Towers, who for twenty-five years has advanced through various positions to be deputy collector, has been promoted.

No single element in employment will better stimulate moraie and encourage ambition than the knowledge that merit is the real test for promotion. Other cities recognize this, but have difficulty in effecting such reforms while the positions are considered within the realm of politics and the spoils system prevails.

The present District government has started an excellent practice, and both the employes and the City of Washington will benefit if it is continued as a permanent policy.
